Intellectual Property gives authors the right to control the first legal reproduction of their works of authorship. This means that the author can prevent others from producing copies or adaptations of their work, and that no one can unfairly copy or alter that work without the consent of the author. Authors also have the right to control the use of their works in other ways. This allows them to insist that others pay them for the use of their work. Of course, if an author wants to be paid for a work, they need to keep it a secret so that others are not able to copy it.
