I have an update screen that allows the user to select a new image to be added to a new form. My problem is that i have to find the correct size for the newly added image. I need to know the width and height of the image once it is added and fit it on the form. I have seen from the form designer that the resolution must be 800x600 but once the image is loaded it does not adjust to the width/height in the designer. Any suggestions on a OOP approach to this? A: You must set the size of the form to 800x600. That is how the form designer determines the size of all controls on the form. It's not the size of the image. Then in your code, resize the form to fit the image. Q: What is wrong with my JS toggle class? I am having an issue with a javascript toggleClass on my site. No matter how hard I look, I cannot figure out why it is doing it this way. Its at I really just need it to run ONCE when the div is clicked but it repeats itself every time its clicked. Here is what the code looks like: function buttons() { var listButtons = document.getElementsByClassName('button'); for (var i = 0; i < listButtons.length; i++) { listButtons[i].onclick = function () { listButtons[i].classList.toggle('active'); }; } } (function() { var ir = false; buttons(); setInterval(function() { if (!ir) {
