My beliefs are that software companies have to get their processes down to a minimum. They must treat their customers well and, at the same time, stay as exclusive as possible. For a company like Adobe, they have such powerful and well-established tools, that it is very difficult for them to change a lot. However, a lot of you have by now probably heard about several new features of Photoshop that are now in the works. Macro, for example, is the new scripting language of Photoshop, according to Adobe. When you are browsing through Photoshop, you will see that the interface is extremely wired. Photoshop CS is still quite old compared to what's available now. It is not so much about how modern a tool is (I would even argue that Photoshop will always be a tool, rather than a program). What matters is how easy it is to use and how powerful it is. Click on the right side of the screen and drag the tool control into the main tool area. A toolbar like this appears on the screen. This toolbar will change and may also be hidden. We'll come to that in a second. You can hide the toolbar by clicking on the little "::" symbol. Magic Functions are also available in Photoshop for the Mac. There are quite a few handy image effects, very easy to use. But, be warned, some effects may involve a fee. You can find them in the first section of the menu. Unfortunately, Adobe seems to leave their less-popular ones in the end of their menu. The image effects panel was integrated into the UI. This seems to be a deliberate decision, because it is more logical and logical to access all the effects by clicking on the small line of the effects. This also makes your life easier.
